The House in which The Plague

Broke out in 1064. At the north-west corner of Drury-lane there a parrow alley, called Ashlin's place. Two grave. It has seen evil days and much sorrow. always has been a doomed sort of place; and is. in fact rips for carting away, whenever the improver ventures up Ashlin's place Bathed in the noisome and postilential airof an ill-paved, difficulty be driven if they once found an entry. But dismal and repulsive as the old house in Ashlin's-place appears, even to the most basty observer, it strikes a greater terror and disgust when one is told that in this very house exactly memorable Decambar day, 1664. Here began that ghastly disease that carried off, not much is reason to suppose that the bours was, at the time, an old elothes shop, and that some Frenchmen, who were either lodgers there or lived next door, fled to Bearbinder-lane, near the Manaion house, now called George street.

and there died, spreading the disease in the City. The signs of infection soon showed themselves-foverichness, hard breathing, torpor, romiting, dryness of the tongile, swellings shind the ears and under the armeits—then lelirium and death. The Government sent three loctore to inspect the bodies in this alley, and certifying that they had died of the plague, the forrible fact was announced in the next weekly bill of mortality. All the city trembled. A few weeks later a wise how was passed, to lock up the infected houses through London, and to place watchmen at the doors, night and day, to prevent exit or entrance. A great red cross, too, was painted on the door of all bouses where the disease had shown itself, with these words, "Lord, have mercy upon us!" The livid, plaguestruck bodies were emptied from carts into great pite, that had been dug for the purpose at Finsbury and elsewhere. On several occasions persons who had fallen down eick on the steps of churches or in doorways, were carried off in these carts, and came to their senses only just in time to escape being buried alive. Many of the London doctors basely fled; but others (such as brave Dr. Hodge) persevered in their daily visits, taking the precaution of smoking a pipe and drinking a cordial before they sallied out on their daily rounds; when they entered infected houses holding to their noses their walkingcanes, the hollow tops of which were smellingbottles, filled with sponges dipped in aromatic
